Cultural capital is a term used to describe the social and cultural advantage that some people have, usually when they have more wealth. This social or cultural advantage results in more opportunities to move up in the world. However, other sources of cultural capital include knowledge, skills and education, because social networks and culture add real value. Ofsted describe it as 'the essential knowledge that pupils need to be educated citizens, and that it is our role to introduce children to the best that has been thought and said and help them to engender an appreciation of human creativity, achievement and ambition.'

enhance our knowledge and interest of the global world (current affairs and sustainable development goals) develop the skills required to impact on the local community and the wider world.

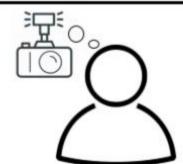

Enhancing the children's cultural capital will mean our children will know more, do more and remember more and this will empower them to become architects of a better world.
This includes experiences that...

lead to a realisation of opportunity and spark inspiration.

develop values that result in acts of compassion live long in the memory.
